New Officers for CPRG

The CPRG board met at the America Outdoor convention in Salt Lake City this last December. It has been a struggle to get nominations for the officers of CPRG. T-Berry’s term was over last year and he carried an additional year as president because no one stepped forward—until now. That guide is Dusty Simmons and she would like to fill the role as our president; Dusty currently works at Tag-A-Long Expeditions. For vice-president Dave Focardi has stepped forward to replace Michele Hill; Dave is a guide at Sheri Griffith Expedition. For Vernal director, Herm Hoopes will replace Clark Hatch. For the Moab director, Eric Thompson will replace Dusty Simmons. Our sincerest thanks to all for serving past and present.

If guide members object to this ad hoc leadership please act by March 1, 2000, provide nominations and we will do an election. If you are interested in serving on the CPRG board in the future, or known someone who would, please let us know. We have many goals and objectives waiting for leadership.

Dear John,

As always, I enjoyed reading the most current issue of The Confluence, Volume 6, Number 2, Fall 1999. I found the article by Jim Strong, regarding the names of our regional rivers, particularly interesting.

As you know John, Canyonlands Natural History Association (CNHA) has been involved in the development of Plateau Journal, a regional publication dedicated to the interpretation of the Colorado Plateau. While I was serving on the editorial board of that publication, a question arose that has haunted me ever after. The question is that of the Rio Colorado—Red River place name.

Mr. Strong mentioned several times in his article that the source of this place name was from the Spanish term for red river. While I could never debate the "Big Red" nature of the river we now call Colorado, especially in the spring runoff, the Spanish translation for red river would be ‘rio roja’ not ‘rio colorado.’ Colorado is in fact an adjective that means colored, it does not translate to red.

Upon consultation with linguist Louis Robledo of Brigham Young University, an even more interesting twist emerged when he said ‘Rio Colorado’ could be translated to mean either ‘colored river’ or ‘river of changing colors.’ While language, and specifically place names, are not an exact science, I felt that these translations more correctly describe the character of the river I have enjoyed so much while living here in Moab. Day to day, hour to hour the color and mood of the river seems to change. To me, this is so much more than ‘red river.’

Thinking not only about the uniqueness of the changing colors of the Colorado River, but also of the vast array of colors we see from the red rocks of Moab to the summits of the Rockies, I really value the rich linguistic depth of the term ‘Colorado.’ In some ways, I find comfort that a culture which some may define as simplistic, seems to be more adept in describing the natural world around them than we are today.

Sincerely,
Brad Wallis
Executive Director, CNHA

Trespassing on the Indian Nation

From a renewal notice by Darren Smith, the CPRG Grand Junction director.

In the name of professionalism stop supporting trespassing into the Indian Nation. It does not support our mission.

Darren brought this topic up at our board meeting in Salt Lake City and we all agreed that the guides need to set a good example of professionalism by honoring tribal lands according to the wishes of the tribal council (s). To not would indeed be a compromise of our mission statement (see preceding page, first column). We ask all guides to please not camp or lead hikes on the Indian Nations without the permission of the tribal government.

There is also the issue of trespassing on private land while conducting a river trip, for example: Rock Creek in Desolation Canyon, in the vicinity of Moab, Green River, and from Grand Junction to Westwater, to name but a few.

Be a professional and know the boundaries of our public lands where camping and hiking is allowed by law.

A Good Deal for Guides
